Honing the Craft of Leadership. Former President and CEO of Walgreens, Greg Wasson, offers audiences insights into the traits that make leaders successful. He shares stories of his remarkable journey at Walgreens while delivering practical and straightforward advice on how to hone audience's inert leadership capabilities. One key trait is embracing being thrown out of your comfort zone. He tells a story of how he almost said no to managing a new market for Walgreens – a rise that would have required him to move from Boston to Las Vegas. Ultimately, he seized the opportunity, and the Las Vegas market became the top new-market opening in Walgreen history, blowing away sales projections and catapulting Wasson's profile within the company. Wasson believes being open to new challenges is a key trait of successful leaders. He also gives audiences advice for building buy-in within large organizations, explaining how he successfully implemented a new corporate strategy by progressively expanding the circle of involvement until it included the entire company. He advises audiences to stay in touch with their people, especially on the front line, noting that they and their 12 most senior people can't solve everything by themselves. Finally, he suggests, "Don't get ahead of yourself. First and foremost be the best at your job you possibly can."
