

Jonathan Capehart

Pulitzer Prize-Winning Journalist, Associate Editor for the Washington Post, and Television Personality

Making Sense of Today's News. As the anchor of MSNBC's The Sunday Show with Jonathan Capehart, an opinion writer for The Washington Post, and host of the podcast "Cape Up," Jonathan Capehart regularly talks with newsmakers about the day's biggest political and culture issues, touching on hot-button topics including how race, religion, age, gender and cultural identity are redrawing the lines that both divide and unite America. In speeches, Capehart tells stories of his interviews with presidential candidates, media personalities, sitting politicians, CEOs and entrepreneurs, and even actors to illustrate what's going on in America and how to make sense of the daily news. An entertaining and thought-provoking look at the news that matters now, Capehart leaves audiences with new perspectives and a greater understanding of the current climate in Washington and across the nation.

Diversity & Inclusion. Jonathan Capehart is well known for his efforts supporting both the African American and LGBT communities and, in 2014, he was named the 9th most influential LGBT person in the media (out of 50) by Advocate magazine. Here, Capehart discusses the big issues at the heart of conversations about diversity and inclusion, including how embracing differences improves a company's ability to respond to change, spurs the creation of innovative solutions to emerging challenges, and creates a happier and more engaged workforce. Sharing experiences from his own life, and with his trademark wit and humor, Capehart helps foster important conversations to create a more productive workplace for all.
