

Domenico Montanaro

Senior Political Editor and Correspondent, NPR

Covering Washington: The Politics, Policies & Power Shaping America's Future Montanaro can speak to the latest trends in politics, including his reporting from inside the White House, analysis of the latest legislative movements and the electoral landscape. He has a deep knowledge and understanding of polling and data and how they apply to presidential and congressional campaigns. And he can speak to a wide range of policy subjects, and where they're going on Capitol Hill – from health care and tax reform to immigration and infrastructure. He has a deep understanding of context and history and where this moment fits into the broader landscape, how democratic institutions are holding up and the global tension between nationalist populism and the global order that has largely been responsible for the world's security post-World War Two.