Mara Liasson

Senior National Political Correspondent

The Changing Face of American Politics. When it comes to politics and elections, Mara Liasson is of the most trusted voices in political journalism. In her positions as Political Contributor for Fox News, National Political Correspondent for NPR, and the host of several award-winning news magazines, Liasson wields the experience needed to provide audiences with a solid understanding of the issues. Serving as White House correspondent during the Clinton Administration and covering every presidential election from 1992 to 2016 for NPR, Liasson delivers a candid perspective on how the media will impact the politics and policy issues facing the country today.

Experienced Election Analyst. After 20 years of reporting on American political happenings and landmark events, Mara Liasson has established herself as an authority on all things politics. With a long career as NPR's congressional correspondent, White House correspondent for the Clinton years, and finally the general political correspondent, Liasson has memorized the American political scene. With her unique insight, Mara Liasson is bound to add an important voice to your upcoming election discussion.